 IMPORTANT *****

No Special Rules or Procedures noted at this time.

Inevitably every year, there comes a point in the summer when the thermocline is so deep that the water pressure bass have to endure to hang out there just isn't worthwhile. It's around this time of the summer when the water temps have peaked that we see a decent chunk of the bass population abandon the depths and make their way back to the banks. Often, these are some of the larger, more experienced bass that make this early transition ahead of the masses a natural phenomenon occurs that shows just how resourceful, instinctual and intelligent bass really are. Forming small schools often referred to as wolf packs, bass will begin to hunt in numbers, similar to how you see wolves and other animals hunt in packs. The bass just seem to know there's a better chance for each of them to eat if they attack. (Story by Shaye Baker)
